Dear Principals,

One is happy as a result of one's efforts, once one knows the necessary ingredients of success – a certain degree of courage, love of work and a clear goal. Success is no vague dream, of that I feel certain. By the proper use of experience and thoughts, one can draw much from oneself. By determination and commitment, one can even restore what's gone failure once. So let's live life as it is, and never be ungrateful.

The most thoughtful among us can conclude that success must exist inside if it is to exist at all. It can be composed of outward signs or appearances, but only of intangible personal values of success stemming from a mature philosophy. You know one of the things which impressed the world most about Mahatma Gandhi was the published photograph of all his earthly possessions at the time he died: a pair of spectacles, a pair of sandals, a few simple garments, a spinning wheel, and a book. Yet the world knew that here had passed one of the richest of men. Perhaps the world in the wells of its consciousness, was somehow aware of the fact that a man is such in the proportions of things, he can let alone. This means a human being if he lives successfully, gradually matures into a person who needs virtually nothing. Gandhi was himself an example of such growth and success; so rare an example that his life dramatized for the rest of us how short we fall of the human growth potential.

There are certain constant factors to be found in true success. They are the dynamic factors in so far as academic success is concerned, the very bone and sinew of it.

01. The first constant factor is purpose. One must know that in whatever he does he is moving forward toward goal (academic targets here). As long as one has purpose he feels that his energies and creative thoughts are taking him somewhere higher; otherwise though one may vegetate successfully, one cannot live successfully.
02. Success has the intrinsic character of a batting average. It is not all of a piece; not every hour, nor everyday is uniformly successful. Rather there are upturns in success separated by temporary failures, which need, however, be made stepping stones for better success. This bears age old testimony that success i.e. 100% pass result is not that easy. However, the matured person like you wastes least energy in fretting over it so that you may have more energy with which to build for the success that you seek.
03. The next constant ingredient of success is the price of it. There is no success for free. What I believe is success is written upon the poise and efforts. The success demands efforts – and that is a mystical little aspect of human character which exists in all of us. The relationship between success and efforts is an inseparable whole.
04. The satisfaction of success need not be identifiable by anyone else or to anyone else so long as the person himself knows it is there. Your teachers, if in their own hearts there is a good feeling, a connection that they are doing well at work they love, then an essential ingredient of success is theirs, if anyone knows it or not. So much of this ingredient depends upon the individual's attitude rather than upon overt evidence.

The way you look at the academics decides how the community manifests for you. Therefore, improved academics and its success theories can vastly expand and improve your understanding and experience of life. It can raise your perspective and self identification into a higher, more successful perspective where you remember that everything happens for the best.

To sum up, success is no straitjacket. It is no mold into which all must be poured. It is no rigid stamp. It is an individual as our fingerprints or the look in our eyes. All we need is the courage to be, and realise. However, it is all upto you. No one else can live your life for you. No one else can succeed for you. It's your move. You are brave soul, built up passionate pursuits of your highest target of 100% pass result in Class – XII & X.

I request to share the DO with your teachers (one copy to each).

I request to acknowledge within three days.

With regards,

Yours sincerely,

(Isampal)
